SPITZER AND HIS CREDITORS

THE DEPARTING YOUTH MADE CALLS ON SOME OF THEM BEFORE TAKING THE ALAMEDA.

N. H. Spitzer, who left yesterday on the Alameda and thereby surprised many of his friends, is held up by some as a model among departing debtors. Spitzer didn't skip in the way it is so often done by those who have accounts which they do not settle before leaving. It is stated, but instead he went to see those to whom he owed accounts and told his troubles.

One firm where the young man owed a small account received a call from him with an offer to go to work. Spitzer said he was hard up and would have to leave and would send the cash later if he got it. At several other places Spitzer gave a similar account of himself. Then he wended his way to the Alameda and is now on the briny deep. If he could have started a gambling proposition which he desired to float Spitzer would have stayed and made money, it is said, but the police wouldn't stand for it, apparently not believing in the late James K. Kaula's theory of gambling as a means of subsistence that ought to be encouraged.
